

Join us?

IOGP works on behalf of the world's oil and gas companies and organizations to promote safe, responsible and sustainable exploration and production.

Together

You can judge an organization by its membership.

IOGP consists of most of the world's foremost publicly traded, private and state-owned oil and gas companies. Our members also include industry associations and upstream service companies.

IOGP Members produce over a third of the world's oil and gas—safely, efficiently and reliably.

These efforts help to meet the world's growing demand for heat, light and transport.

Getting your message across

Part of IOGP's role is to represent the interests of member companies and organizations.

From our headquarters in London, we address a variety of global and regional bodies including UN agencies, the World Bank, the ISO, the International Regulators' Forum, OSPAR and the Arctic Council.

Our Brussels office provides an essential conduit for advocacy and debate between our industry and the European Union.

A dynamic structure

IOGP works through a network of more than 50 standing committees, subcommittees and task forces. Participants come from member companies and organizations, bringing with them a wide range of know-how, data and experience.

With support from IOGP's secretariat, the work of the Association's committees reaches a wider global audience through publications, events and an expanding media programme.

Over to you

Any upstream company—private, public or state-owned—may apply for IOGP membership.

So can any upstream association—national, regional or international—that has at least two current IOGP members on its books.

Companies that provide technical oil field services (as opposed to support services such as transport, catering and cleaning) to one or more existing IOGP members are also invited to apply for associate membership.

What it costs

The membership fee is based on the member's geographical range of operations and total production level. A European supplement is also payable by members operating in the European Union.
